The Graduate School has approved that authors may request either a sales and/or format restriction. While the use of sales or format restrictions are not recommended by the Graduate School, there are cases where exercising a restriction may be prudent. Careful consideration should be given before deciding. Examples:

1. The dissertation will be edited for publication as a monograph and the publisher considers that the availability of an electronic version of the dissertation constitutes publication, thus, preventing the author an opportunity to publish in traditional sources. In this case, a "format restriction," which stops accessibility to the electronic version for a specified period of time (e.g., to December 2005) may be advisable.
2. Papers will be prepared for publication and the publisher will not accept information considered previously published in a widely accessible electronic form. In this case, also a "format restriction" (e.g., to December 2005) may be advisable.
3. The dissertation contains patentable research. A "sales restriction" (e.g., to December 2005) may be advisable.

It is important to keep in mind that exercising a restriction will prevent copies of your dissertation from being made available to others outside of the University who wish to read about your research in a timely fashion. If you are considering exercising restrictions, you are advised to discuss the matter with your major professor. If a restriction is selected, this form must be signed by your major professor or adviser to indicate that he or she has been consulted and agrees with your decision.
